This 1 ½ day introductory course to space law will be comprised of three modules.

The first module will provide a general overview of space law: what it is, how it has developed and what legal framework for activities in outer space it provides. It will focus on international space law, the seminal 1967 Outer Space Treaty, and the place and role within that context of private commercial space activities, which also includes the general role of national space legislation and licensing regimes in this context.

The second will zoom in on the specific law on launch and other space transportation activities, as the category of space activities is basically indispensable to any commercial activities in outer space itself. It will address both the relevant international law and some key national space law regimes, notably that of the United States.

The third module will then move to space mining as one of the most promising space sectors for future commercial operations, and address both the applicable international law and the international discussion on how this should be further developed, as well as the few instances where national legislative initiatives in this respect have already been taken.

LEARNING OUTCOMES

- Review what space law is, how it works and what its impacts are on private commercial space activities
- Analyze the substance of the 1967 Outer Space Treaty and some other key elements of international space law
- Discuss how national space legislation implements and interprets international space law vis-à-vis private sector space activities
- Evaluate the legal framework for space launch and other space transportation activities, both internationally and at the national US level
- Examine the main legal parameters that commercial space launches and other space transportation activities will be confronted with and thereby prepare appropriate policies and other actions to maximize the opportunities for such activities
- Discuss the status of international law regarding space mining and the current discussions on its further development
